The "nameless terror" is simply the war between the major philosophical principles that have dominated my life, more particularly, the denial of man's unique rationality. When contemporary experience seems too difficult, I may bounce around historical residues and find even more inappropriate ways of formulating the problem.

1. < 1961 A Man is a rational animal. (individual) social

2. 1961–1966 Man is a communicative animal. (species)

personal
3. 1966 Each Man is very complex, mostly ~~inacceptable~~ inaccessible but one searches for some harmony and reinforcements of his parts. (fine structure within the individual and the species)

By ① a man should design an orderly life, stick to the rules, and if need be limit his passions to "friendly detachment" as the means of doing so. Avoid conflict at all costs. If one has foresight, being sometimes unblinded by passion, one has a special responsibility for the regulation of one's acts – even one's emotions. Jealousy is the worst sin.

Man's greatest fulfillment is the employment of his reason for the understanding of and mastery of nature; which incidentally will satisfy all humanitarian needs.

I tend to overlook some of the incongruities of ① vs. ②

② Man's unique attribute is communication, and the worst sin (or disease) is withdrawal, isolation, outlawry. Not all of that communication is rational, verbal. It may be constellated in passion. It can hardly be always orderly and free of conflict; and there is a price that may be demanded for the inconsistencies. Man's greatest fulfillment is the sharing of his experience and insight, as broadly ② and as ③ deeply as he has the means to discover. Love contra amicability is necessarily more highly speciated but is the ideal quality of human relationship.
